HONOR TO LEE TO-DAY

Hundredth Anniversary of Birth Will Be Observed.

TRIBUTES TO HIS MEMORY

Principal Celebration in Washington Takes Place at the New Willard This Evening—Noted Men to Make Addresses—Hilary A. Herbert Will Preside—Public Is Invited.

To-day marks the one hundredth anniversary of the birthday of Gen. Robert E. Lee, that illustrious leader of the Southern armies having been born on the 19th of January, 1807.

The anniversary will be celebrated in every Southern State and there will also be observances of the day in several Northern States, particularly in those cities in the East and West, where Southern societies have been organized.

It is to be noted also that for the first time in the history of the country there is a disposition to pay tribute to the greatness of Lee as a soldier and to his exalted character as a citizen.

Recently a considerable number of newspapers in the East and the West have in their editorial columns illustrated a remarkable change of feeling toward the peerless commander of the Confederate armies, thus seemingly indicating the eventual acceptance by the entire country, without regard to section, of Lee as a great national hero, whose fame is a heritage of the whole American people.

Celebration This Evening. The principal celebration in Washington will take place this evening at the New Willard, where the four leading Southern patriotic societies, the Daughters of the Confederacy, Confederate Veterans, Sons of Confederate Veterans, and the Southern Relief Society, will honor the memory of the great Southern general. The programme comprises addresses by Senator Berry, John Sharp Williams, and Mr. Justice David J. Brewer, all of whom will speak upon patriotic subjects, and music by the United States Marine Band, under the leadership of William H. Santelmann.

The choir of Epiphany Church has also been engaged for the occasion, and will sing Gen. Lee's favorite hymns. A letter from President Roosevelt, eulogizing the dead leader, will be read. Hilary A. Herbert will preside at the exercises. There will be no charge for admission to the celebration, and the general public is cordially invited to attend. It is expected that there will be a large attendance, and arrangements have been made for the accommodation of the guests.

Among Senators and Representatives who served in the Confederate army the memory of Robert E. Lee is held in loving remembrance, while those whose age precluded their taking part in the great conflict show no less tenderness in speaking of him as a man and admiration in considering his achievements as a soldier.

In the cloakrooms and the committee-rooms of the Capitol and in the lobbies of those hotels where the peculiarly Southern element is to be encountered the talk turns naturally upon Lee.

The following are some of the tributes to the leader's memory in speech: Senator Benjamin R. Tillman, of South Carolina, quit school in July, 1864, to join the Confederate army, but to his lasting regret was stricken with a severe illness which kept him an invalid for two years and caused him the loss of his left eye. His estimate of Lee is characteristic:

"No man living has a higher regard for Gen. Lee than I have. I regard him as the Chevalier Bayard of America, a man sans fear and sans reproach, whose cleanliness of life and moral greatness compel universal admiration, while his military genius has been rarely equaled and only surpassed by Napoleon. He was the typical product of Southern civilization before the war, and will bear comparison with any man of any nation of any age."

Senator Edward Winston Pettus, of Alabama, who is now nearly eighty-six years old, became a major in the Twentieth Alabama regiment when the war broke out and came out of the struggle a brigadier general.

"The American people by general consent," he said, "have given Gen. Lee the highest place among American generals, and this opinion does not seem to be confined to the Southern portion of the United States. It may be true that military men would consider the delicate notions of humanity as in some degree lessening his efficiency as a commander. The only charge that I have heard against Gen. Lee was that he was too humane for the work of a military chieftain, but if you take the judgment of the soldiers who served under him, he was certainly the greatest American commander, and many of them believed him to be the greatest commander who ever lived."

Representative Adolph Meyer, of Louisiana, served on the staff of Brig. Gen. John S. Williams, of Kentucky, holding finally the position of assistant adjutant general.

"Gen. Lee was a man of such matchless qualities, it is difficult to say anything about him that has not already been said," remarked Gen. Meyer. "As a leader in war, however, I would place him by the side of Marlborough, Wellington, and Prince Eugene, the military captains of the first class."

"His attractive personality, kindness, and cordiality to young men impressed me most vividly. He had the absolute confidence of every soldier in all the armies of the Confederacy. Even those who never had seen him retained for him a confidence and devotion which was hardly short of marvelous."

Senator McCreary. Senator James B. McCreary served through the war, having the misfortune to be taken prisoner.

"The world has never known a greater soldier than Robert E. Lee," said Senator McCreary. "He was a hero of the greatest struggle ever made by devoted men in behalf of the cause they loved."

"Whether he is viewed as the great general executing his fearless purpose to do what he believed to be right, regardless of results, or as the peerless citizen, or as the college president training young men of the South, or as the humble Christian, all who love courage, patriotism, integrity, devotion to duty, and Christian resignation must honor his memory and accord him a place in history beside the greatest generals and the most conspicuous citizens."

Senator Money. Senator Hernando De Soto Money, of Mississippi, served in the Confederate army from the beginning of the war until September 14, 1864, when he was forced to retire because of defective eyesight. He said:

"Gen. Lee inherited from generations of gentle ancestry the highest ideas of honor, morality, and duty. His whole life was governed by his strong sense of duty. He always seemed to feel that much was expected of him, and he could not disappoint such expectations. He never allowed his personal wishes or predilections to change the even tenor of his thought or of his conduct. His moral character, so far as we can know, was without a blemish. Bred to the military profession, he yet studied and thoroughly understood his duties and obligations as a citizen. Thoroughly loving the Union, as I believe he did, he did not hesitate in giving his services to his native State. The military leader in a great war, in which vast armies were employed and bloody battles fought, he was never elated by victory nor depressed by defeat, and was willing, not only to take the blame of his own acts, but that of others, to himself."

Col. John S. Mosby, the famous Confederate guerrilla, who is now a special attorney in the Department of Justice, and resides in Washington, said: "Among the many noble virtues of Gen. Lee, that which I have always considered the noblest has been seldom remarked by even his greatest admirers. That was his more than manly unselfishness, his rising above the least jealousy of the glory won by his successful subordinates—a temptation that none but the rarest of men can withstand. The fame of his great general has been marred by this weakness, but it never dimmed the crown of Gen. Lee's glory. Often did he fall to give just due, and oftentimes more than was due, to the generals he commanded. No military leader can boast of a higher attribute of true greatness than the glorious magnanimity of Gen. Robert E. Lee."

Confederate and Union Soldiers in the Delegation. "A party of about one hundred veterans of the siege of Fort Fisher were received by President Roosevelt at the White House yesterday afternoon, and they presented him a badge commemorating the reunion of the blue and the gray. The reunion was held three days ago at Wilmington, N. C., and the President had been unable to accept the invitation to be there. Both Union and Confederate veterans, including two colored men, were in the delegation that called at the White House. The President made a brief speech, after which the chairman of the delegation said:

"And now, Mr. President, one thing we want you to know; we, and so far as we know, all our comrades, are with you as one man in what you have done in connection with the Brownsville affair."

The President's remarks were as follows: "It gives me peculiar pleasure to greet this organization. Many different organizations of our countrymen are received here at the White House; but, after all, while they all have the right to come, the right is most complete in the case of those to whom we owe it that we have a national government at all—our veterans of the civil war. I am pleased to learn how well you were received by the men who wore the gray. To-morrow night a letter of mine will be read on the occasion of the 100th anniversary of the birthday of Lee; and it is just such action as that of your organization in fraternizing with the organization of ex-Confederate soldiers by whom you were received, which accentuates the truth of what I have said in that letter; that this war, the great war for the Union, alone among contests of like magnitude in modern times, has left us the right to be proud, not only of the Union (which by your deeds has become in very truth a Union throughout its length and breadth of this land), but of the courage and steadfast devotion to the right as each man saw the right alike of the men who wore the blue and of the men who wore the gray."

"I want to bear testimony to the fact that wherever I speak to an audience of veterans of the civil war I speak to an audience composed, not only of good citizens in their several localities, but of men who have been consistently striving to show in their deeds their belief in the words of Abraham Lincoln, by conducting themselves 'with malice toward none and with charity toward all.'"
